

I find it very hard to agree with the idea that artificial consequences are good for children's development. My view is that it often "works" in terms of getting short-term compliance, but undermines intrinsic motivation and other qualities needed for meaningful adulthood.